In rural India, degrees don't make doctors

NON-MBBS HEALTHCARE providers are in a minority only in two states, Assam and Kerala, while there is wide variation in terms of quality of knowledge of the healthcare providers across states.

The researchers measure quality of knowledge against the mean MBBS performance within the sample, on accuracy of diagnosis and treatment of four health conditions —TB in young adult male, pre-eclampsia in pregnancy, diarrhoea and dysentery in children.

As per the study, informal healthcare providers from Tamil Nadu and Kerala had better knowledge than the average MBBS in Uttar Pradesh and Bihar. Indeed, no healthcare provider across segments in terms of qualification in UP and Bihar was above the national standard for quality of medical knowledge. All states, barring Kerala, Himachal Pradesh and Assam, reported a higher proportion of informal healthcare providers above the mean-MBBS knowledge level for the state than MBBS doctors below this level.

"While higher state SES predicts a smaller presence for non-MBBS providers, the association is weak and driven primarily by the inclusion of Kerala," say researchers Jishnu Das, et al, in the study published in the journal Social Science & Medicine. Kerala, as per the study, reported the highest proportion of villages with at least one MBBS doctor available (both public and private sector) — 56.1%, compared with West Bengal's 22%, which was the next highest. While the southern states (undivided Andhra Pradesh considered for the study) recorded double-digit figures for this, only two from the rest of the states, Punjab and Assam, had a similar showing. This seems borne out by Union health ministry data that shows, upon a back of the envelope calculation, 1 allopathic doctor at a PHC for every 21,800 people in Kerala versus every 62,300 people in Uttar Pradesh (as on March 31, 2019). With similar gaps in terms of healthcare personnel, there have been attempts to regularise informal healthcare providers – Chhattisgarh had rolled out a 3-year diploma for rural medical practice, which was later junked, while West Bengal had started a training programme; even the Centre had talked of a bridge course. But these have met stiff opposition from interest groups like the Indian Medical Association. The study also finds that better-performing states in terms of quality of healthcare provider were doing this at lower costs per patient.

More testing may see Mumbai become corona capital again

AT A positivity rate of 27%, Mumbai would have had 22,680 more infections. This would take the total number of cases in the city to 92,305 versus Delhi's 70,000.

It is possible, of course, that Delhi's infections – they rose by 23,288 over the week versus 14,292 in the week before that – may have grown faster if Delhi had done more RT-PCR tests instead of the rapid antigen tests that show a lower rate of positive results (this is a flaw, which is why most recommend using the RT-PCR on persons who test negative in an antigen test). Separate data on the positivity of RT-PCR versus antigen tests, however, has not been made public.

Mumbai, as it happens, is not the only place to be testing too little. Gujarat's tests have been in the 4,500 to 6,000 range for over a month now, whereas positivity rates have stayed the same at 10.7%. Some states which have increased testing have seen positivity rates shoot up. Haryana, for instance, was doing 2,893 tests a month ago versus 5,049 now has seen a near 10-time jump in positivity rate to 9.5%.

Lockdown forces companies to innovate

THE COMPANY has so far produced 1,00,000 face shields and about 7,000-8,000 sq metre of curtains, and feels if the ban on exports of face shields are lifted and logistics becomes smooth within the country, it could make up to half a million of these in the next six months as it sees Southeast Asia as a lucrative market. In the meantime, the company has supplied table covers to restaurants in Bengaluru as washing of linen after every use could prove to be time-consuming and an expensive proposition.

However, Harkness has a challenge – its products are dearer compared to its counterparts in the market. The PVC made medical curtain, for instance costs ₹1,800 for a pair of 3 ft by 7 ft size, while the cloth medical curtains are available for ₹1,200 a pair. Also, the face shields are three times the price of the ₹37-40 available currently in the market. Daniel claims the company's products are superior both in make and in quality. "People are not able to see the life of it versus the price of it," he said. The company currently is in discussions with a lot of cinema chains, hotels and retailers across the country.

Indian textile major Arvind has come up with an anti-viral fabric, which it plans to make use in making shirts for menswear and also sell it as loose fabric which can be used to stitch garments. Partnering with a Swiss textile innovation company HeiQ, the company has launched the fabric under 'Intellifabrix' brand which will be available in all Arvind outlets and retail channels starting July. The speciality of the fabric is that it has been proven effective against the human coronavirus 229E & SARS-CoV-2, causing Covid-19, with 99.99% reduction of virus in 30 minutes, said Kulin Lalbhai, executive director, Arvind.

The idea, he said, came in April with the realisation that Covid-19 will not go away soon. The company then started scouting for technologies with which it can treat the fabric and readymade garments, which is when it came in touch with HeiQ, which specialises in anti-viral and anti-microbial technologies for textiles.

"It is tested in Switzerland and is clinically approved. It is not harmful on skin and despite the treatment the fabric stays normal," he said. While the fabric neutralises the virus, it also does not allow retransmission. "The chemical stays for 30 washes and that is a pretty good measurement," Lalbhai claims. As for the pricing, the readymade shirt will cost customers around ₹2,500 and fabric will cost ₹600-1,000 per metre. While currently only for menswear, the company may look at expanding the range to women's wear as well.

The same technology from HeiQ has also been used by another listed textile firm Shiva Texyarn, which is primarily into making protective gears against chemical and biological weapons, cold weather clothing, ruck sacks and carrying gear for the armed forces. With the primary business muted at present due to sluggish demand, the company is currently experimenting with making face masks with anti-viral coating and may venture into making protective cover clothing for doctors. Targeting retail route to make them commercially available by next week, the company is currently producing 20-30 lakh masks. However, it has the capacity to scale it up to 2 crore a month, which it plans if the market receives the product well.

Sundararaman KS, managing director, Shiva Texyarn, said the company is going to launch the mask at a retail price of ₹49. "The idea is to take very high protection to the common man. We are in the launch phase and we are just awaiting international certification to come to us formally," he said, adding the company has received 400 distribution enquiries across the country.

In another innovation, Zicom Electronic Security Systems, which provides electronic security solutions like CCTV cameras, home and office security solution systems, has found an opportunity in Covid-19 to extend its product offering to include contact-less thermal screens made for residential and commercial establishments.

Along with security, safety of health has also become an essential requirement, which propelled the idea, said Pramoud Rao, managing director, Zicom Electronic Security Systems. The screens, he said, can be installed at the gates of housing societies where a person entering the building can show the wrist in front of the screen and it shows body temperature in degree Celsius and Fahrenheit. If the body temperature is higher than the optimal, the thermal screen raises an alarm. The technology and hardware, which have been built in-house, are available in two price range ₹13,000 and ₹19,000 a piece. "The system is completely contact less and is much more efficient than the Chinese temperature guns that are being widely used," claims Rao.

Home-based testing kits could soon be a reality

"TESTING CONTINUES to be a challenge in managing Covid-19 and is likely to remain so for the years to come. Currently, Real-time Polymerase Chain Reaction (RT-PCR) tests detect genetic material to perform coronavirus testing. However, such tests can be performed in laboratories only, require several hours, have low rates of specificity and sensitivity and pose risks related to specimen collection and sample handling," Anurag S Rathore, Professor, IIT's Department of Chemical Engineering, told PTI.

"Additionally, these tests cannot be performed by individuals at home. These risks can be minimized by developing IgG and IgM based ELISA assays and home-based testing kits," he added.

IgG is the most abundant immunoglobulin to be produced in response to an antigen and is maintained in the body after initial exposure for long term response. IgM is the first immunoglobulin to be produced in response to an antigen and is primarily detected during the early onset of disease.

"Coronaviruses are composed of several proteins including the spike (S), envelope (E), membrane (M), and nucleocapsid (N). This assay we propose will utilizes the microplate-based enzyme immunoassay technique," said Rathore, who is also the institute's Dean, Corporate Relations.

"The technology for purposed ELISA assay for detection of coronavirus and robust and economical expression systems for production of N and S protein antigens can be transferred to national diagnostic centres and private companies specializing in developing home based kits or point-of-care devices, respectively," he added.

While Rathore did not comment on what will be the approximate cost of the test kit, he said, "it will be considerably cheaper than tests being performed now. However, we will have some concrete results in a month's time and we will be able to analyse only then".
